People Prefer Pot

Cocaine, crack, heroin, Oxy's, and any number of designer drugs all have one thing in common—they wouldn't be around if pot were legal.

Ask anyone you know who does hard drugs, or has ever been treated at a methadone clinic for it. They will tell you that if marijuana had been available, cheap and legal, they would never have tried hard drugs in the first place.

As it turns out, the experts were lying. Instead of being a gateway drug, marijuana is actually a 'gatekeeper' drug instead. That's to say that as long as there is plentiful, cheap marijuana around, people tend to smoke it instead of doing hard drugs.

When the supply of marijuana runs out, they turn to whatever is available. Often this is alcohol, which is far more damaging to both the family and the individual, but more often they turn to hard drugs.

The supply can run low for a number of reasons, but they all boil down to the fact that the plant is illegal, and very easy to detect and destroy.

Shipments of marijuana get interrupted all the time, often from law enforcement activities or theft, and that causes the market to run out temporarily.

Many users cannot withstand the shortage, and fall prey to their instincts, which lead them toward the widely available hard drugs. Often they are unable to shake the new habit and return to pot on their own.

We need to rethink our strategy on the drug war, and realize that domestic marijuana is our friend and should be completely deregulated. With it we can eliminate drug overdose, and keep over $200 billion here in our own economy that would otherwise be used to fund our enemies.

Without it, things are going to slowly get worse. Trade deficits, global warming, drug overdose, war, terrorism, hunger, poverty, and all that go with them seem to be a much worse alternative than legalizing domestic marijuana.

You can Grow Marijuana Anywhere

Legal or not, marijuana can be grown in a wide variety of places. It could be cultivated in the space station or on the ocean floor (with a little preparation, and some high intensity lighting, of course). It already grows on every populated continent.

Almost any soil is suitable for growing some strain of the marijuana plant; it adapts to new conditions faster than any other plant, and can actually improve poor soil. Growing without soil is becoming the trend—along with hiding it in secret closets, attics, basements, and spare rooms. The trick is really simple—don't tell anyone what you do and never, ever allow anyone to see it for themselves. If you want to grow marijuana, telling somebody else is what will get you busted.

Roll Over Cheese Eater!

These days, you can't trust anyone with a secret. If you smoke pot, or deal it to your friends, keep that secret between those people who are already involved in it. No new members should be allowed in the group.

You should be especially wary if one of the people in the group wants to introduce somebody new who you do not already know. Often times this is a result of said friend getting busted, and said new person is an undercover cop or an informant working with said friend.

Informants are a bad breed, because they get away with their crimes (which they were dumb enough to get caught for in the first place) by turning in other people who they know are committing other crimes.

The police make a 'plea bargain' that involves testimony or active participation in the form of controlled buys, hidden microphones, cameras, and more.

What it amounts to is your friends' friend is going to be filling out some paperwork on you, and that paperwork will pave the way for a warrant.

This is how 75% of all marijuana trafficking busts occur—the cops put the pressure on whomever they happen to bust for pot, for information. If they talk, they go free and dozens of other people then get arrested, put in the same bad position, and given the same bad choice.

“You should be especially wary if one of the people in the group wants to introduce somebody new who you do not already know. .”

Hemp Composite Stronger than Aluminum

Hempseed oil contains a number of complex carbohydrates, many of which can be refined into useful compounds such as oils, fuels, and plastic resins. One such compound is a very hard resin that can be mixed with the hemp stalk to produce a composite building material. Similar in structure to wood, this material can be formed into bricks or dimensional lumber, and is strong enough to replace some structural aluminum. It is flame retardant, nontoxic when forcefully burned, and extremely resistant to weather. Hemp fibers can be blended with hempseed resins to form a compound which can replace fiberglass, and another which is similar in properties to vinyl.

We can grow this resource every year, for much less energy and environmental impact than current methods and resources. We should eliminate all restrictions on domestic marijuana. Once we do, our looming problems will soon fade into happy memories. We will be able to look back upon these days and say to ourselves, “We did it”.

“Domestic marijuana is not legally controllable by law according to the Constitution.”

Freedom and Law Enforcement

Freedom is defined by laws which are compatible with the Bill of Rights. If a law restricts a right declared in the Bill of Rights, (or any right reserved by the people) it is not a law, to the extent that it does not comply with the Bill of Rights.

Laws also have to be based on jurisdiction—they have to have a basis in the Constitution in order to be legitimate.

Many laws are enforced which do not measure up to either of those two demands, and therefore by definition are not laws. However, law enforcement and the court system have not yet declared them so, and people are being arrested every day.

Domestic marijuana is not legally controllable by law according to the Constitution. They routinely violate most of the Bill of Rights as well during enforcement and eradication efforts, costing us billions.

Jury Duty: Know the Difference

Got selected for jury duty on a marijuana trial? Don't just be a nodding head, read the Constitution and Bill of Rights before you go to trial. Do what's right.

Find out the background of the case—was the search warrant valid? Were there other drugs found? Was it a growing operation or just a reseller? Kids?

Once you know a little about the background of the case, ask yourself if this person was most likely producing marijuana or reselling imported marijuana. This is technically the only kind of marijuana covered under federal laws, although they state they cannot tell the difference easily and will confiscate any.

Well, in some cases it's easy to see the difference between domestic marijuana and imported marijuana, or at least it's easy to know when somebody got caught with the whole plant, that it was probably grown in this country.

In cases like that, where marijuana was being produced, you should always vote that person not guilty. The district attorney and judge will not instruct you to do this, but it is perfectly legal and in fact your obligation to do exactly that.

State your reason to be that domestic marijuana is not the source of any problem in this country, but imported drugs of all kinds are, and that the punishment doesn't fit the crime.

"junior decides to take a hit of acid and comes home tripping. Mom and dad are not impressed, and demand an answer as to what he's taken, and he is too scared to admit what he is really on, so he tells them that he has been smoking pot. Pot is not seen to be as dangerous, and thereby less punishment is in order."

Pot Takes the Fall for Other Drugs

The worst lies you hear about marijuana are the ones told by people who were using it. What they usually don't tell you is that they were almost always also on hard drugs or alcohol, and it was often their first and last time smoking pot.

The scenario unfolds a couple of ways. In the first one, junior decides to take a hit of acid and comes home tripping. Mom and dad are not impressed, and demand an answer as to what he's taken, and he is too scared to admit what he is really on, so he tells them that he has been smoking pot. Pot is not seen to be as dangerous, and thereby less punishment is in order.

The other scenario is the party drunk who has way too many, and at the end of the night smokes a little bit of pot for the only time in his life—and can only remember certain parts of the night. They claim that it was the pot that got them all messed up, until you ask them what they had been drinking.

"The point is that you can love your country and your president (I love G.W.B. a lot more than B.C.) and still speak your mind about certain topics of interest."

We Love Freedom

Writing what you feel is a real pleasure. It also puts a series of thoughts in order, in a way that useful information can be shared among various people.

That's one beauty of living in a free country, and I'm the first to say I love this country, and will defend that right for others.

The point is that you can love your country and your president (I love G.W.B. a lot more than B.C.) and still speak your mind about certain topics of interest.

This newsletter is protected under the first amendment to the constitution; it is a freedom which everyone should salute.

So are all of our freedoms, to what extent we still have them. Let's keep this country free, and legalize domestic marijuana. That would free a million people from prison who have done no wrong, and increase our economy by almost 8% in the first year alone, before export.

Know Your Rights On The Streets

It pays to know your rights. Most people are not familiar with the difference between a request and a demand when it is presented to them by a law enforcement officer.

There are strict rules governing the behavior of police, and they are based directly on the Bill of Rights, and various court precedents ever since.

What it boils down to these days is that there are any number of things that the police can request of you, but most are not demands. In fact, the police never demand anything.

If they are asking you questions about what's in the trunk, or what's in the glove box, it is because they do not have the right to just go look. If they had the right to do so, they would surely have already done that. They do not use respect and courtesy when they have a right to search, they use swat tactics. They use their charm when they do not have the right to pin you to the concrete and handcuff you.

That all changes if they find anything they are looking for, of course. Once they have the tiniest bit of evidence that there may be something else illegal in the vicinity, you will be immobilized while they conduct a complete search, one like you have never seen. This will happen automatically if you are arrested; they actually do it under the false pretense that they are looking for a weapon, and it is just for their own safety, but they have already arrested the suspect, leaving nobody to use any weapon. They will use any excuse to get you to allow them to peek in places they can't see. If they find what they think is there, however, they did so with your permission. Without it, they would be conducting an illegal search and seizure, and the evidence would be thrown out.
